Limited Innovation

Much of the oral care industry remains rooted in legacy formulations, with little integration of modern dental research or conscious ingredient innovation. As a result, the category has seen minimal evolution.

Lack of Sustainability

Conventional packaging choices often overlook sustainability, relying heavily on materials that add to long term environmental waste.

Short Term Solution

Many products focus on short term results without addressing the deeper foundations of long term oral health.

Animal Testing

Ethical considerations remain a concern in parts of the category, as certain brands have yet to fully move away from animal testing practices.

Despite the size of the oral care market, innovation across ingredients, packaging, and consumer experience remains limited.

Market Landscape

With oral care reaching $5B at 7.9% CAGR, growth will be driven by oral beauty.

The oral care market is a large, mature incumbent category with strong and recurring consumer demand, dominated by legacy players. Despite its scale, the category has seen limited disruption, leaving significant headroom for modern, premium-led innovation

Packaging formats, toothbrush designs, and toothpaste flavors have remained largely unchanged for years, with most brands competing on price and basic functionality. The category continues to be positioned as everyday hygiene rather than an aspirational, design-forward or experience-driven product.

This creates a clear whitespace to build “Oral Beauty” as a differentiated sub-category — focused on elevated design, premium formulations, sensorial experiences, and lifestyle positioning — unlocking higher ASPs, stronger brand affinity, and improved gross margins.

Premium categories in India are growing 2–3x faster as consumers upgrade to aspirational brands — yet oral care remains stuck in a functional past, creating a massive untapped opportunity.
